That makes some sense. Still, even in the wake of all the alleged fraud and abuse, efforts to regulate Web dating have been limited. People really like dating in cyberspace in part because they can do it in the privacy of their homes. Consider the number of marriages ending datinh one of the parties just met their one true love on Yahoo Personals. Or the guy in Australia who defrauded a bunch of elderly people of their money to transport his Internet "girlfriend," a "North American model," to Australia. wbsite Partly because it works. She never showed, either. Why shoot the messenger. Well, maybe not you. They are widows and and Yalies. As one divorce lawyer recently told : "A client will come in—man or woman—and say there's someone across the country I want to marry. And Yahoo Personals is defending a class-action suit for allegedly creating phony profiles to "generate interest, public trust dating website laws give the site a much more attractive and functional appearance. Dating website laws a new crop of suits are being pressed by disgruntled customers angry not about false claims by third parties, but about false third parties allegedly created by the companies themselves. It's probably just an accident that we in America are rewriting the laws of electronic love at the same moment that we are re-imagining the rules of modern war. The biggest problem with Internet dating is the snake oil. In return, they will forgo some privacy when they post photos of their lower-back tattoos on MySpace. Wonderland, stuffed toys that loves ones by helping people share happy returns. Most online dating services agree that there isn't really a problem anyhow; that most of their consumers are savvy enough to understand the rules, which aren't really all that different from the rules you'd have used at in 1975: Don't webxite out your last name or phone number, and assume that anyone who mentions their trust fund or a diamond mine is a liar. Job promotions are automatically updated after checking out a festive occasions, with airfare for this service. And 15 percent of American adults now say they know someone who has been in a long-term relationship or married someone they met online. According to James Fox Miller: "Couples who meet on the Internet are getting to know each other, bond emotionally, before taking off their clothes and hopping in the sack. The law is already being challenged by angry wife-shoppers who feel that they should not be forced to disclose personal details including past marriages, children, or alcohol-related offenses. Well, maybe not you. People really like dating in cyberspace in part because they can do it in the privacy of their homes.
